Alterations in the subcellular localization of the iron transporter ferroportin and the iron exporter DMT1 after bleomycin treatment. In order to determine whether an increase in the uptake of iron from the plasma is required to maintain the levels of cellular iron homeostasis in the lungs during the acute phase of inflammation, we have investigated the effects of bleomycin on lung membrane transporters of iron. Following a single dose of bleomycin administration, the labelling density of the plasma membrane and late endosomal/lysosomal marker LAMP2 (lysosomal associated membrane protein 2) was reduced, as measured by quantitative immunofluorescence in isolated alveolar type II epithelial cells. In addition, the labeling density of the labelling density of the iron transporter ferroportin was significantly reduced, as determined by immunogold labelling. The iron exporter

DMT1 (divalent metal transporter 1) was increased in the plasma membrane of alveolar type II epithelial cells in response to bleomycin treatment, as determined by quantitative immunogold labelling. These findings indicate that the reduction in the expression of ferroportin in alveolar type II epithelial cells following bleomycin treatment may be a consequence of reduced labelling density, whereas the increase in the labelling density of DMT1 may be an adaptive response to maintain the cellular iron content during the acute phase of inflammation.
